ANTARCTIC PRESS WELCOMES STUDIO DÔDÔ TO AMERICA

WHY I DESERVE MY TYRANNICAL POWERS OVER THE STRUGGLING CREATIVE SOULS WHO ACTUALLY WRITE AND DRAW COMICS

by Herb Mallette

When I was a kid, reading comics, I always found myself curious about that one guy in the credits who didn't seem to do anything. I worshipped the artists whose names appeared after "Drawn By," I laughed, shuddered and cheered at the dialogue that was "Written By," someone else, and I could at least see that something was sitting on the page due to the efforts of "Inked By," "Lettered By," and "Colored By."

But "Edited By?" Was I seriously supposed to believe that this guy contributed anything when all the real work was clearly accounted for already?

Then, when I grew older, an even greater surprise awaited me: I found that "Edited By," not only hung around in the credits without appearing to really do anything... he or she was actually the one who was given all the power by whoever published the comics. "Edited By," decided who worked on which books. "Edited By," determined whether or not someone would be allowed into the hallowed ranks of comic book creators. "Edited By," even told the writers and artists what they could and couldn't do, at least some of the time. This seemed just plain wrong to me, and when Ben Dunn made me editor of EXTREMELY SILLY COMICS in 1989, all I really did was proofread the stories, put them in order, and write up a table of contents and an editorial. I gave no advice, I pulled no strings, and I really felt I had no deserved claim to a place in the credits.

Learning the error of my ways took four years of critiquing sessions in college writing courses, six years as an advertising copy editor and four or so years editing the comics section of MANGAZINE. The truth is... creative people don't know what they're doing. And I say that as a creative person, who spent most of his childhood trying to figure out how to draw comics, and who has spent the bulk of his adult life writing thousands of pages of stories, novels and scripts. When you create, the work comes from somewhere inside you — but in a curious way, you're also inside the work. You lose your perspective, and while you may recognize that something's not quite right, you're often too close to your creation to know just how to fix it.

That's where the editor comes in. A good editor can keenly analyze what works in a story and what doesn't, what makes a piece of art successful and what holds it back. A good editor can also communicate that knowledge directly and constructively to the creators, in order to help them make their work better. Editors are necessary because very few creators are so good that their work needs no improvement.

But wait, you say. If editors are actually supposed to function as helpers to the creators, why are they the ones who have all the power? Well, the answer is that somebody has to have power, or else publishing companies would just have to print everything, from the comic doodles of first-graders on up. And if someone has the knowledge and skill needed to decide what's good enough and what isn't, then he or she should also be qualified to help all but the very best creators do better work.

So in the end, it's a dirty job — kind of it over creators, crushing their dreams and forcing them to revise their cherished artistic visions — but somebody's got to do it.

And by gum, it might as well be me.
